

Making Lives Better: Providing safe clean drinking water and waste management to hundreds of First Nations Communities

Canada has well over 300 communities struggling with waste disposal, waste water management, and clean water supply.

“Waste is no longer a dirty word for remote communities,” declares Alistair Haughton, CEO of Vancouver-based Assured Renewables. With over four years of uninterrupted service in the community of Old Crow, Yukon, Haughton and his team have helped to refine a water and waste management service that can easily be implemented in communities with similar needs.

Assured Renewables have built a system that allows communities to save money on both capital equipment costs and the ongoing maintenance and monitoring of systems. Any additional funds communities may have budgeted in anticipation of a massive expense are then able to be redeployed to other community programs.

By developing strong, honest relationships with both the communities and their respective leaders, Assured Renewables is entering the market having developed the expertise and experience necessary to serve communities in need of proper water and waste management.

Efficiency is key. Assured Renewables has leveraged its founders’ years of industry-relevant experience to create a system which allows for professional installation of managed services and infrastructure without delays, largely owing to the speed at which Assured is able to implement a system once approval has been granted by decision-makers in the community.

“We are not trying to ram technology down people’s throats and declare that we are here to save all,” says Haughton. “We just want to assist with a solution to a problem that has long been identified already by these communities in need.” Assured Renewables imperative is to drive social and environmental change; a long-lasting transformational benefit to society through the creation of partnerships in First Nations’ communities across Canada.
